In the 1940s, the Lucky Strike cigarette factory on Richmond’s Tobacco Row had the capacity to make 100 million cigarettes per day. In 1945, the American Tobacco Company commissioned this painting for a Lucky Strike advertising campaign. Officially untitled, the work has been called the “Tobacco Genie,” highlighting the idea of small tobacco farmers as the force behind Lucky Strike’s internationally known cigarettes.